Autobiography

Lorenz is a first-year student at De La Salle University currently taking BS Computer Science, with specialization in Computer Systems Engineering. He spends his free time developing projects, playing video games, and practicing digital art.

From a young age, he has been interested in the field of STEM, especially in mathematics and its applications in computer science. He has also held a strong interest in language and the arts, having taken part in campus journalism organizations throughout his high school journey. In what most people see as two radically different fields he sees crucial similarities: creation and discovery.

He believes that creativity is the defining strength of mankind. With our own hands, we will one day be able to shape even the most distant of stars. That is what Lorenz wishes to do.

Term-end Reflection

The first year of university leaves many with an odd feeling of being in the transition state away from being a high school student. It is, in many ways, a fresh start. You have the freedom to unshackle yourself from any regrets that may have been weighing you down and begin this new chapter of your life with a clean slate.

GEPCOMM, along with the other courses I took this term, gave enough breathing room that I was able to get a feel for the college experience. Although I had expected GEPCOMM to be difficult based on the syllabus, it turned out to be just the right amount of challenge to keep me engaged. The course gave me experience writing at the college level which, while not too far from the standards set by senior high school, remained a step above what I had experienced so far. However, even though I feel I had done well with the writing exercises, I realized that I have room for improvement in collaborative environments.

I will continue to expand my horizons throughout my stay in the DLSU community to work on my strengths and alleviate my weaknesses. I could not have had a better introduction to my four-year stay at DLSU. With what I have learned from this term, I will be well-equipped to accomplish what is expected of me in future courses.
